Excerpt from Heating and Ventilating Shops and Offices

Sometimes an ordinary steam ejector connected into the return is all that is necessary to clear the pipes and start up the circulation. Such a device is shown in Fig. 4, and the method of connecting it into the return main, in Fig. 5. Sometimes defective circulation may be confined to one particular building or section of the heating plant. In this case all that is necessary may be to connect an ejector into this particular branch, and exhaust the air and water once or twice a day as may be required. If this branch connects with the main return at some distance from the receiving tank, the exhaust may be blown outboard, as it will be operated only for a short time and the waste will be small. Connections for the arrangement above described are shown in Fig. 6. Whenever ejectors are used in this way it is necessary to have steam at a higher pressure for operating them.
